History

There is a garbhagriha, a antarala, a sabhamantapa and a mukhamantapa. On the south another garbhagriha is located. The temple has access from north and east, now the east entrance is closed. In the garbhagriha is a small linga on a pitha square in the lower and circular mouldings in the upper. The ceiling is of three rotated square and in center is decorated with padma. The garbhagriha doorway is broad and well carved, here are Saiva dvarapalas. The dvarapala on the left hold damaru and trisula in the upper hand and akshamala held in varadamudra and gada in the lower hand; the dvarapala on the right hold snake and khatvanga in the upper hands and akshamala and gada in the right and left respectively. In the exterior the temple is constructed on a rock surface. Its adhisthana consists of a jagati, a padma, a kantha. Over the adhisthana is a seven-tier superstructure in kalinga form. Each tier is of a kapote course containing curved padma moulding below and rounded top with uncarved kudu projection. Above these tiers are a padma, a kantha, a sikhara and a stupi. A dilapidated plain sukanasi is seen over the antarala.
